

OPERATIONAL EXCELLENCE

Drive Short Term Performance Increases

Operations Excellence Score

The operations excellence assessment is a survey consisting of six questions for each of the six categories of the operations excellence key drivers.

The outcome (see example below) shows a “score” (the OE score) per driver. The results can be used in multiple ways.

For one it will show areas for potential improvement.

Secondly, in the more detail containing workshop, it will show how closely team members are aligned with their view on operations.

Thirdly there will be comparison available with best in class.

Focus for us is on short term activities which yield improvement and potentially can be managed in virtual settings.

How do companies combat Covid and improve operations?

What sounds like a conundrum is possible and we have seen it with some of our clients throughout the last couple of months.

We took this observation as a signal to analyze what those companies did and do different. We found that they have a few factors in common. They all center their improvement activities around a more longer term and larger “picture” striving for excellence.

We have created out of those commonalities a survey (see left) which allows you to measure yourself against what we call best in class in Operational Excellence.

Most companies we know have programs like Lean or SixSigma already implemented. What sets the “excellent” companies apart, is how well initiatives and programs have been implemented.

This is where we come in. Aperia International, with its experts across the entire production value chain, is uniquely positioned to provide more detailed information and assist with further discussions. During a workshop using the Operational Excellence survey results we will together with you and your team analyze, discuss and brainstorm what could be changed quickly to give you an edge over competition and move the needle - fast.

We understand best that these are not the times to launch large programs. Attention is on remaining operational with a healthy workforce, being more flexible to changing customer demands BUT this doesn’t mean things can’t run better.

We are here to help on a small and if needed on a large scale.

We have already successfully completed Excellence Programs during the pandemic in mostly virtual settings, enabling you to move ahead even in those unprecedented times.
